The implementation of the MDGs: the role of ICTs

The information and communication technologies are not a panacea or magic formula. But they can improve the lives of everyone on this planet. We have tools that can propel us toward the Millennium Development Goals, instruments with which to advance the cause of freedom and democracy, vehicles with which to propagate knowledge and mutual understanding. We have all of this potential. The challenge before this Summit is what to do with it.

Goals

WFWO^{net} conducts its activities at the national and international level and its goals to promote through Schools and Universities to implement the Goals in the United Nations Millennium Declaration can be summarised as follows:

At the national level:

WFWO establish a network of Schools interested in carrying out activities and in order to improve quality education, particularly its ethical, cultural and international dimensions by developing effective teaching approaches, methods and materials. This network is designed to have a multiplier effect through the diffusion of information on results obtained so that other schools in the country can carry out similar activities to support the MDG's

Working together for a better world

At the regional level:

Countries within a region often share common denominators such as language, religion and culture. To strengthen these bonds, each region of the world is encouraged to set up an educational Plan of Action, to include regional seminars and workshops for National Co-ordinators and teachers, student and teacher exchanges, and other initiatives and events, most notably initiative projects to support the MDG's objectives.

At international level:

Efforts are made to facilitate an exchange of information on WFWOnet at all levels, the conduct of international initiative projects, special events, campaigns, contests and to encourage contacts and links of solidarity between participating institutions to support the MDGs objectives.
